Occupational Stress in the Service Professions Helen R Winefield

Occupational Stress in the Service Professions introduces the reader to contemporary theoretical and research issues and provides a comprehensive international review of a range of professions including nurses, correctional officers, police, fire fighters, volunteers, the clergy and teachers. The book identifies the main sources of stress and the implications for intervention. Well illustrated with case studies of a number of organizations, the book serves to explore the political and social nature of the work stress problem and implications for intervention, policy and the future. Graduate students, researchers and high level HR professions will find this an invaluable work.
